	[PASTUCHOVÁ NEUMANNOVÁ, Andrea] In this chapter of the scientific monograph, the author interprets the essence and significance of communication as one of the key conditions for the effective functioning of an organization. She outlines both the verbal and non-verbal components of social communication, the management process as a targeted influence on the behavior of individuals within an organization, and decision-making as another crucial process involving the selection among several possible courses of action. The chapter describes factors influencing effective management, as well as the causes of communication breakdowns and recommendations for preventing them. In the following section, the author presents selected specifics of crisis intervention as a distinct form of communication in crisis situations—one that requires not only knowledge of recommended procedures but also personal predispositions of individuals providing crisis intervention. The chapter also introduces the CISM (Critical Incident Stress Management) method.
